Langdon Cheves, in the Southern Convention: At Nashville, Tennessee, November 14, 1850 We meet on a melancholy occasion. It is to devise the means of defending the Southern States against a great and alarming danger, a danger with which we are not threatened by a foreign foe or a common enemy, but by our fellow-citizens, whom fraternal feelings and fidelity to plighted faith; whom gratitude for great benefits which, more than all other causes, have made them great, wealthy and powerful; should have made our hearty friends, and our devoted allies in all adversity. Instead of which, we find them our most unjust oppressors, our bitter and most unappeasable enemies. Having deprived us, practically, of all power under the common government which bound us together, they are aiming at the subversion of our dearest rights, the destruction of our most valuable property, and the desolation of our country. Our inquiry will, of course, be of Southern rights. Southern wrongs, and Southern dangers. The general rights of the Southern States are those of...
