Waddell, by Kheir combined efforts could produce no finer representation (of evening) than that which follows in the four succeeding lines. There is not, in the whole compass oi Shakspeare a more perfect picture, including figure, color, action, time, flnd sound, with moral sense conjoined, than is here presented in some two-5cents0l cents words: yet the whole concluding portion of this wonderful work was dashed ofl most probably during an evening s walk or ride from Kilmarnock to Mossiel, in child-like acquiescence with the suggestions of a printer, and to meet thl requirements of the compositor when his operations began. was merely the creature of the poet s imagination, created for the purpose of holding chat with his favorite Lualh. --Lette1 of Gilbert Burns, vol. iii., Appendix, Currie s Ed. p The main object of this poem, Dr. Currie has remarked, seems to be to inculcate a lesson of contentment on the lower classes of society, by shewing that their superiors are neither much better nor happier than themselves. The dogs of Burns, excepting in their talent for moralizing, are downright dogs, and not, like the horses of Swift, and Hind and Panther of Dryden, men in the shape of brutes. The first variation we have to notice is in the sixth paragraph of the poem, --some of the poet s more squeamish critics having prevailed on him to change a very simple, natural and graphic couplet to a very tame and inexpressive...
