Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: . . . the less homeopathic, even if we should, at times, prescribe compounds and administer remedies from an empirical standpoint. From the present situation of affairs there can be no question as to the foresight of Huflander, in his predictions nearly one hundred years ago, when he said there will be a gradual amalgamation of the more liberal members of the two schools. And if the philosophical reasoning, not by extremes but by golden means, is true, and via this route we attain the highest state of perfection, is it not a mark in favor of homeopathy to have a graduate from the dominant school use even one remedy and use it homeopathically? Should we have in our makeup an ambition to show what we can do with homeopathic remedies prescribed in accordance with the law or is it better for the cause to clothe ourselves with an impenetrable garb and learn to neither give nor take? Figuratively speaking we can divide a certain percent of the graduates from homeopathic institutions into Jews and Greeks for as Christ crucified was unto the Jews a stumbling block and unto the Greeks foolishness so the law of similars seems to be with this certain percent of our numbers; and while none are perfect, no not one, yet men generally know to which political party they belong and while they may now and then scratch the ticket, caring not who knows it, they are never ousted from the primaries but always...
