Not illustrated. 1891 Excerpt: .of study in Germany may be mentioned the acquisition of a great enthusiasm for the future of American scholarship. Our freedom from the trammels of history and tradition; our ability to stand on neutral ground and to choose the best in thought, let it come from what source it will; the alertness, the vigor, the independence, and the faithfulness of the American scholarship which one sees busied in the university, --all give one the feeling that time is the only element lacking to place the American scholar in the very front rank of the world s scholarship. In conclusion, it may be added that it is no slight gain to have been in touch, even for a limited time, with the personality of leaders of thought in philosophy. The most popular of the professors of philosophy, I believe, unquestionably, to be Professor Paulsen, --a tall, rather stout, vigorous man of forty-five, with iron-gray hair, and smooth shaven face, with a somewhat Websterian type of countenance. In his crowded public lectures he stands, but he usually sits during the lecture, and critically studies a piece of crayon, or a penholder which he is continually turning in his hands. He talks with great deliberation, with only very occasional glances at his very scanty notes. There is a peculiar charm in his method. It seems like very thoughtful conversation. His chief characteristic is absolute clearness. He knows what he wishes to say, and says exactly that. He has a...
