Not illustrated. 1868 Excerpt: .stained glass remains, and deserves careful notice; the red and green vine-leaf pattern bordering the lights is especially graceful. On the N. side is an unknown tomb, probably that of the builder of the chancel, and on the floor the very fine brass of a knight of the Septvans family, an excellent example of armour, temp. Edw. II.: on his shield, surcoat, and aillettes or shoulder-pieces, are 3 wheat-screens or/cms, the arms of the Septvans. The mailed coif is thrown back from the head. Tho hauketon of leather appears at the wrists, and again below the ringed hauberck. The poleyns or knee-pieces are highly ornamented. There are 3 smaller 15th cent. Brasses for rectors of Chartham, and one for Jane Clefforht, 1530, of very peculiar workmanship. Between the nave and chancel are trefoil-headed hagioscopes. In the S. transept is an elaborate monument by Rysbrach for Sir William Young and his wife Sarah Fagg; and adjoining are other records of the Faggs of Mystole, all of whom it appears exemplarily satisfied the ends for which they were born. The N. transept contains the monument of Dr. Delaugle, 1724, a French refugee, who became canon of Westminster and rector here. The whole of this ch., but espeoially the chancel, deserves the most careful examination. Notice also a noble yew in the ch.-yard. The village of Chartham is built round a green, on one side of which is the Delangle House, built by the Doctor, and marked by a...
